The Russo dwelling is a brick and frame bungalow with a low-pitched, gable roof located on the east side of Berlin's South Main Street and situated close to the intersection of Washington Street with South Main Street. A simple frame garage is located at the rear of the property on the north side.

The bungalow is characterized by patterned brick walls at the first floor level, the pattern being one of dark glazed headers alternating with light stretchers across each course. A partially exposed chimney on the south end rises midway in the front roof slant. The 3 x 3 bay dwelling has deep roof overhang with brackets. Windows are 1/1 throughout.

The principle facade has a central doorway with a forward projection creating a vestibule. Triple 1/1 windows flank the entrance. Centered above the entrance is a large, low dormer with brackets, exposed rafters and three single-paned horizontal windows. A porch extending across the front with brick piers under a shed roof has been enclosed with 1/1 windows above half walls. These half walls and the area above the windows are covered with siding as is the pediment area above the first floor on the gable ends.

Of note on the north gable side is a pair of small 1/1 windows with two courses of glass block above.
